

It is the 1930s, and in the countryside the tractor is taking over from the horse.

Wilf is a farmer whose traditional methods have served him well all through his hard-working life, but when his younger brother-in-law Totty insists on introducing new technology in the form of a tractor into their family business, Wilf fears that the balance of nature will be upset.

A family feud develops and things get worse when a mysterious stranger appears, and the family fear that he is possibly a ghost, or an angel, or... a Boggart - a spirit portentous of disasters.

They decide to take action, but their hilarious ineptitude and the interference of the eccentric busybody Mrs Mayse have significant consequences for the family.

National Theatre and Royal Shakespeare Company playwright Nick Darke's funny and thought-provoking story has something important to say about our present concerns for the environment.
